This invention relates to an electro-deposition paint using titanium carbide and more particularly, it is concerned with a method for producing a high-quality electro-deposition paint using titanium carbide. There have been known electro-deposition paints, which contain a conductive particulate material, a binder containing a resinous component and an organic solvent as basic constituents, and cause electrodeposition of the particulate material on an electroconductive substrate by immersing the substrate into the binder and the organic solvent contained in the paint (or an electrolyte) and applying electric current thereon. The particulate material contained in the paint is composed of a conductive inorganic substance, an example of which is titanium carbide. This electro-deposition paint is especially useful as a rust-proofing paint for car body and other application fields. When the paint is applied to the electro-conductive substrate and electrolyte is fed thereto, the conductive titanium carbide particles contained in the paint are electrodeposited as titanium metal or titanium carbide and form a thick continuous film on the surface of the substrate. The resulting titanium metal or titanium carbide film, which is not susceptible to corrosion, is called a rust-proof film. Since the rust-proofing paint is applied to the auto body and is often left in a hot place, it is desired that the paint has a high weather resistance and long-term durability. In order to improve the weather
