Health care costs are soaring for everyone, and for low- and middle-income wage earners who receive their health insurance through their employers, health insurance costs can be a huge burden. Many Americans don't realize that health insurance only pays for health care services, not related medical expenses — such as care related to mental health or rehabilitation after a major illness. With the exception of about 15 percent of people covered by Medicare and Medicare Advantage plans, health insurance pays for about 85 percent of all health care.

Many workers aren't aware that they can supplement their health insurance coverage and pay cash for routine medical care, prescription drugs, and health insurance. Employers and unions that offer a flexible spending account (FSA), for example, allow workers to use pre-tax dollars to pay for medical expenses as well as other expenses. Nearly all of us should consider creating an FSA to cover health care expenses for ourselves or for our families. And without a doubt, the best way to create a successful health FSA is to work with a qualified financial planner who has the knowledge to help you find health savings and prepare your health care costs for the future. 1. Plan ahead. Start today. Health plans are expensive, particularly when someone is diagnosed with serious illness. Make sure you have adequate funds in your health savings account — an FSA provides a vehicle to create a high-deductible health plan that leaves you with enough money to pay for medical costs that aren't covered by your health insurance. The best way to create an adequate fund in a new plan is to first consider enrolling in a high-deductible plan. For example, for a family of four, you might start with a plan that has a deductible of $2,000 and expenses in excess of that amount will have to be paid out-of-pocket, which could mean paying for high deductibles and coinsurance until you have saved enough money. Once you reach the $2,000 deductible, you can enroll in a plan with a lower deductible, which usually increases your coverage and also
