Meet America's first celebrity astronaut, the cranky but brilliant scientist who rockets to the moon - and back again! 109 iN NOW By Dave Gillespie and Michael Rose In the fall of 1992, thousands of people are killed by giant thunderstorm cells in the American Midwest. These storm cells are created and fueled by two different systems - the Madden-Julian Oscillation (MJO) and the Atlantic Multidecadal Oscillation (AMO) - and how they work together determines whether a severe electrical storm or series of storms will strike. Throughout the history of planet Earth, these twin components of the climate system have regularly interacted, and now they are playing a dominant role in the development of the current pattern of major convective storms and severe weather over North America. The latest insight into the relationship of the two oscillations comes from new data provided by the Research and Forecast
