Q: Jumping between function instances when parent is not destroyed. What is the issue? I have a class that's defined like this: class Parent(Entity): def __init__(self, parent_id, parent_type, parent_name): super().__init__() self.parent_id = parent_id self.parent_type = parent_type self.parent_name = parent_name def update_parent(self, parent_id, parent_type, parent_name): self.parent_id = parent_id self.parent_type = parent_type self.parent_name = parent_name And later the in __call__ method of this class that's used as a parent, I perform some operations and make sure some of my other entities all know about the changes. I call entity_manager.update_parent() class EntityManager(object): def __init__(self, get_parent=None): if get_parent: self.parent = get_parent() parent_id = self.parent.id else: parent_id = 0 def update_parent(self, parent_id, parent_type, parent_name): self.parent = Parent(parent_id, parent_type, parent_name) I do this when needed, and the Parent object I return is a fully viable entity that the rest of the code is happy with, however, the EntityManager which used to act as my parent, does not seem to have any way of knowing about this and is still treating the changed entity as a brand new entity. I have verified this by starting a new game and experiencing the same issue. However, if I instead create an additional method on my EntityManager class, such as update_entity_manager, and call it from
