[A pilot study of the T-cell immunity status in patients with acute diarrhea at the Chengdu No. 2 Hospital]. To detect the level of T-cell immunity in patients with diarrhea in order to understand the pathogenesis of diarrhea better, and to provide theoretical basis for evaluating the pathogen of diarrhea, exploring of the infection source and improving the treatment effect. A prospective study of the T-cell immunity in 20 patients with acute diarrhea at the Chengdu No. 2 hospital of TCM was conducted. And 20 healthy donors' peripheral blood T-cell $CD4^+CD8^+$ subsets and T-cell proliferative ability were detected. There was no difference in the level of T-cell subsets and proliferative ability between patients with acute diarrhea and healthy controls ($P > 0.05$). But, when compared between groups with diarrhea and no diarrhea, the level of T-cell subsets and proliferative ability between groups was significant ($P 0.05$). The T-cell subsets in patients with acute diarrhea and healthy controls were not significant difference, but the T-cell subsets and proliferative ability in patients with diarrhea with or without infection were significant difference.Q: Convert tuple to an array in Ruby I have the following tuples that are returned from an API call: ["123", "ABC", "12", "123", "98765", "12", "98765", "13", "98765", "12", "2342", "33", "98765", "9876"] I'd like to convert them to an array so that I can easily compare them to a couple of other arrays I have. Anyone have any ideas how I'd go about doing this? Note: all of the integer values are unique and the tuples can potentially have the same length. Thank you! A: Try this: a.map { |item| item.split(",") }.flatten This is the same as saying: a.map do |item| item.split(",") end.flatten A: In Ruby 2.3 and later, use a hash instead of an array a.map { |item| item.split(",") }.

Reconstruction of pilon fractures. We have attempted to reconstruct the talar neck and avascular area by closed method, and have tried to evaluate the results. In the former part of the study, the talar neck and body were reconstructed in 48 cases by closed methods, and in the latter, the talar neck only was reconstructed in 30 cases by closed method and in 14 cases by open methods. Reconstructive treatment of the talar neck and body resulted in good stabilization and restoration of the articular function. After an average follow-up of 4.2 years, the mean stability of the ankle was 90% and the mean loss of the talar height was 10%.Seeing the written word on a grainy black-and-white screen in 1920s Chicago, this "Chicago Daily News," to an audience of that era, was like watching a traveling movie. By 1929, it had moved into a hulking office building in the heart of the Loop, reports the Chicago Tribune. It was the headquarters of the federal building commission, and perhaps no matter where one worked, if one didn't, one eventually worked at the Daily News. But 1920s Chicago was not a back-to-the-land kind of year for newspapers. Fewer than 300,000 people were getting their newspapers outside the house, according to the Tribune. Those who cared about the newspaper were paying a dollar a week for a copy of the Telegram. The Daily News, on the other hand, was a fairly stodgy affair. "It's the most read dull newspaper in town," one woman called it to the Tribune, "and that's all right with me. I enjoy it." She was right, too. The Tribune and the Daily News seemed as separate as the Tribune Tower and the Daily News Publishing Company building, and the stories of the two appeared to be pretty different. The Daily News's main focus, usually, was the stock market. On Tuesdays, Wednesday, Thursdays and Fridays, it published the results of the close of the previous trading day. If one was interested in a quick read that was still packed with financial information, the Daily News was the newspaper for it. If one wanted to read about the gritty underbelly of the market, the Tribune was the one to turn to. But the Tribune did have certain things in its favor, starting with its origins. The newspaper was
