Wetland ecosystems provide food and shelter for plants and animals, clean water for people and wildlife, and are the lungs of the global carbon cycle. But they are increasingly under threat. They are in the firing line of one of the greatest environmental challenges, climate change. The Intergovernmental Platform on Biodiversity and Ecosystem Services (IPBES) is the pre-eminent global scientific intergovernmental body tasked with providing an early-warning for ecosystems and natural resources about the scale and impact of the drivers of change in the Earth's biological diversity. IPBES brings together and works with experts from across the United Nations system, the scientific community, government, indigenous and local people to ensure that the state of nature and the natural resources are understood and appreciated.
