{Comments Off on Game of Thrones Season 6 Full Episode 7 Download}Q: Matrix multiplication of non-square matrices (that are square up-to the n^{th} power) I have two matrices A and B , that are $n \times n$ -square, i.e. $A, B \in \mathbb{R}^{n \times n}$. How can I multiply them to get a matrix C such that $C \in \mathbb{R}^{n \times n}$? I guess it would be somehow a simple $C=A \cdot B$, but if so, why does it not work in general? If it would work for $A, B \in \mathbb{R}^{n \times n}$, then it would be the same as multiplying A and B columnwise, the same for both the A and B as $A, B \in \mathbb{R}^{n \times n}$ we would be multiplying the n matrices in each column (including $n \times n$ matrices, respectively, columnwise and the result would be the $n \times n$ result. A more mathematical way to formulate this question is as follows: Let $A, B \in \mathbb{R}^{n \times n}$. How do you "formally" multiply them to get $C \in \mathbb{R}^{n \times n}$, i.e. $C = AB$? A: The approach below works for any choice of A , B and C , as long as C is a square matrix. The result is called Kronecker product and has the form $C = \left(A \otimes B \right)$ where \otimes means the Kronecker product. Of course, you can recover A and B from C by applying the appropriate matrices on the appropriate rows or columns. A: You need to write C as a matrix with two different dimensions, one for A and one for B . C is a $n \times n$ matrix, so you need a $(n \times n) \times (n \times n)$
