What's New in the QScreenshot?

Ease of use Interactivity Evaluation and conclusion 80 Ever been annoyed by people who spam everybody? You know the ones: the ones with hundreds of entries in your Facebook wall, those who leave raving reviews on top programs and retailers. They're the kind of people who make you worry and worry for hours, until you end up with hundreds of notifications in your inbox, days before the promotion has begun. This is not a problem that only cropped up in the first iPhone's era. It's a problem that's still plaguing the Internet, and if you aren't careful, it can seriously ruin your online reputation. It's not a joke, it's a real problem, an elephant in the room that we don't talk about, that we don't acknowledge, that we don't see. That's why today, we're going to have a look at the most annoying bot that probably exists on the web. The one that uses a cron job to send you countless messages to your mobile phone. The one that sends you mail with a subject line like: "Re: Last time you logged into your Facebook account." Those messages probably aren't a problem, in fact they may even turn out to be fun. If you're a teenager, it may even drive the story of your life.

But if you're not that kid, then you surely have no fun at all. Why do they do it? It's not even a question that needs an answer. It's just a user-generated content on the Internet. The idea behind all this is simple: to create a lot of traffic on websites. Whether it's blogs, forums, news websites, or a Facebook wall, the spam is on its way to getting to more and more people. You may think that web design agencies and hosting providers will fight spam, but you'd be wrong. They all know very well that spam is one of the strongest weapons they have in their arsenal, so they just turn a blind eye. We've managed to change their minds a little bit. The long title is the key. The title is a meaningful representation of the spam's content: a long message that you receive a lot of times. You may even think that the spammers don't have a clue about the target they are attacking. They're probably well aware of how irritating those notifications are, but they have no idea what they're doing.
